Centurion is a tank developed by the British Army during the Second World War. It was designed as a replacement for the Matilda II tank, which was heavily armored but had a slow speed and a weak gun. The Centurion was a revolutionary design, featuring a fully welded hull, a turret that could rotate 360 degrees, and a powerful gun. It was the first tank to have a diesel engine, which allowed it to travel long distances without the need for refueling. The Centurion was used in the final stages of the war and was highly successful. It was the first tank to be used in the Falkland Islands in 1982. The Centurion is still in service today and is a popular subject for modelers and historians.
